The Red Sox were leading the heavily favored Mets three games to two in the 1986 World Series when Game Six of the series went into extra innings. New York's Mookie Wilson fouled off several pitches before hitting a slow roller to Boston's Bill Buckner at first base. The ball rolled beside Buckner's glove, through his legs and into right field, allowing the mets to score the winning run from second base. Boston went on to loose Game 7 of the World Series, and the Mets won their second World Championship in franchise history.
